This insightful book explores the intense and ultimately fleeting moment in the 1980s in America when the future looked Japanese. Would Japan's remarkable post-World War II economic success enable the East Asian nation to overtake the United States, or could Japan's globe-trotting corporations serve as a model for battered U.S. industries, pointing the way to a future of globalized commerce and culture? While popular films and literature recycled old anti-Asian imagery and crafted new ways of imagining the Yellow Peril, and formal U.S.-Japan relations remained locked in a holding pattern of Cold War complacency, a remarkable shift was happening in countless local places throughout the United States. Japanese goods were remaking American consumer life and injecting contemporary globalization into U.S. commerce and culture. What impact did the flood of billions of Japanese things have on the ways Americans produced, consumed, and thought about their place in the world? From autoworkers to anime fans, consuming Japan introduces new, unorthodox actors into foreign relations history, demonstrating how the flow of all things Japanese contributed to the globalizing of America in the late twentieth century.

Released ten years after the original 1954 Godzilla, Ghidorah, the Three-Headed Monster marked a palpable change and new direction for Toho's famous film franchise. Godzilla took on a friendlier personality as a defender of Japan, a characterization that would carry the monster throughout the rest of the original series. The film also consolidated narrative continuity between the Godzilla series and Toho's other special effects films, developing recurrent themes in the process. Importantly, it introduced one of Toho's most famous creations, King Ghidorah, situated in a context that foregrounds Japan's post-war history and its curated images of recovery, stability, and affluence. Ghidorah

the three headed monster can be seen as reflective of such narratives in 1954 godzilla stood as an embodiment of wartime devastation haunting a post war tokyo in 1964 an anthropomorphised godzilla teamed up with rodan and mothra to defend japan from the alien king ghidorah these contrasts and changes across tone and character evoke the historical processes that were taking place in post war japan the narratives of which were carefully constructed and exported in highly visible and charged events like the 1964 tokyo olympics this volume in the constellations series offers a history of the film s production a consideration of its place in toho s special effects filmography an interpretation of its social reflections within historical contexts an examination of its legacy and an inspection of its localised us release
