an extensive literature on gender and housework has documented the fact that even when they are employed women typically do two to three times the housework of their husbands it s also the case that women work many fewer employment hours on average than do men so despite the growth of women in the labor force and the increasing tendency of men to participate in housework and childcare traditional sex roles maintain a stubborn presence one event in particular stands out as a powerful catalyst for sex typing within a marriage the arrival of children with young children at home women decrease their workplace hours and increase their housework hours at the same time children have little or no effect on the hours men spend either on employment or housework since social and material rewards aren t evenly distributed across home and market labor the investments that individual men and women make aggregate at the level of social structure to systematic gender differences in wealth and status because children have such a large effect on the way men and women divide labor and because this division in turn has such a large effect on gender stratification it is important to get at some of the underlying reasons that dual earner couples fall back to more traditional roles after they have children what factors are behind a couple s redistribution of labor hours after they become parents i come at this issue from two directions considering first the rise in the proportion of housework hours women do and then the drop on their proportion of employment hours first why don t women resist a division of housework in which they do twice what their husbands do and second why do women choose to decrease their employment hours so dramatically while men's hours register virtually no change in chapter 2 i ask whether women employ a particular equity principle in judging whether the division of housework is fair a principle in which men compensate for a smaller proportion of housework hours with a larger proportion of employment hours i find that indeed women's use of this principle can account for their lack of resistance to a much more sex typed division of housework in chapters 3 and 4 i tackle the issue of employment in chapter 3 i explicitly test an explanation often taken for granted that the decision to drop or not drop employment hours is rooted in a sex stratified labor market in other words that women stay home with children because they make less money than their husbands do having found that a comparative advantage in market labor can't account for men's and women's employment decisions in chapter 4 i ask what alternative reasons there might be i test a psychological theory asking whether a gender difference in work commitment underlies the gender difference in post natal employment hours i find that what might at first look like a gender difference in work commitment is better understood as a gender difference in felt responsibility for care of young children
